Contents

From the Series Editors .............................................................................................................. xi
Acknowledgments ..................................................................................................................... xiii

Introduction

“Everything here will have to change” ................................................................. 1

Chapter One

“Everything has to be rebuilt from scratch in this country, starting with our own Rostov”: The Impact of the Great Fatherland War ...................... 16

Chapter Two

“I will have to hang myself now—life has become simply impossible”: Living Conditions during “Reconstruction” ............................................. 40

Chapter Three

“When will that ‘near future’ finally arrive?”: The Myth of “Reconstruction” and the “Politics of Productivity” ............................................. 77

Chapter Four

“When will we be able to feed our children?”: National Identity, Gender, and Soviet “Family Rhetoric” ......................... 112

Chapter Five

“Every family has its freak”: Perceptions of Collaboration in Occupied Soviet Russia ......................... 145

Chapter Six

“People Without A Definite Occupation”: The Illegal Economy and “Speculation” .......................................................... 180

Chapter Seven

“What sort of democracy is this?”: Political Rhetoric, Popular Perceptions, and Soviet Elections ................... 212
Chapter Eight
“Right now you can’t get anything done without a bribe”: Problems in and Perceptions of the Soviet Communist Party ........................................ 244

Conclusion
“In my opinion, this is all a fraud!” .................................................. 279

Bibliography ......................................................................................... 289

Index ..................................................................................................... 303